These would be the ones that I mass coded after using search terms, but since the quotation mark problem meant that I was not getting what I thought I was from the searches, I need to do them over. I am presuming it will not be as successful this time, and that there will be some remnants that need to go to the coding team.

You can delete any bucket or dataset without impacting the original archive they were derived from. But, if you delete a bucket or dataset, you also delete any coding associated with it.

Before you get completely into that, I want to start redoing the inaccurate early searches and coding resulting from the use of the "curley quotation marks". Is the best approach to delete the buckets and datasets that resulted from those searches, and then redo the searches? - presuming the original comments remain in the archive for that date.
